

Summary

A Collection of Short Stories #3 by Jonathan Olvera gathers an eclectic range of voices, styles, and worlds into one volume. From myth and memoir to satire and science fiction, the stories explore exile, loyalty, wonder, and the absurdities of life with both seriousness and humor.

Readers will meet desert engineers calculating survival beneath relentless heat, dragons spiraling through Christmas skies, courtroom chronicles from fractured kingdoms, and secret dimensions hidden in the ordinary bus stop. Alongside Jonathan's own pieces are contributions from Quilla Raye, Abad Jerónimo de Clairveux, and Kaveh Shirazi, whose perspectives enrich the book with contrast and depth.

Across these pages, narrative boundaries are tested: fables brush against memoir, comedy bends into philosophy, and fantastical creatures share space with meditations on Arizona's sun-scorched realities. Together, the collection forms a constellation of questions: What does it mean to belong? How do we endure regret? Where does imagination end and confession begin?

This third installment continues Olvera's ongoing experiment in storytelling — playful, searching, and rooted in curiosity. Whether you are drawn to dragons, diaries, or deserts, this collection invites you to wander through its many landscapes and discover the light hidden in unlikely places.